

March 12th 2006

Harnessing positive external energies

This week, we continue from a fortnight ago, where we examined external environments that are not conducive to harnessing the best possible energies. Most ill effects will affect the health of the family members, and the ability to generate income

House
Front door

A house facing the sharp corner of a building is said to bring bad energy which will affect the health of family members.

The shortest building in this area is said to suffer from bad yin energy.

The tallest building in an area is said to be a "lonesome" building which will suffer from exclusion.

This building will suffer a direct hit of "through" bad energy. It depends on how far away the building is from the two opposite buildings and how drastic the flow of energy is between the two buildings.

Feng Shui
by Kerby Kuek
info@misterfengshui.com