

Taiwan Feng Shui Expedition

National Palace Museum of Taiwan where Tang, Sung, Yuan, Ming and Ching Dynasties National antique and treasures are exhibited here.

These two buildings were directly facing the National Palace Museum (See above) and since the museum is classified as Yin Feng Shui, these two building were designed as such to serve as face to 'guard' off the excessive Yin energies directly from the museum. Believe it or not, these two buildings were one of the most expensive residential buildings in Taiwan and housed prominent executives and elite class of Taiwan. Please bear in mind that an area required the balancing of Yin and Yang to bring out the best energies. Yin=museum, Yang=residential.

Growing hills and healthy trees to protect unkind energies to flow into this vicinity of the museum.

The Famous Yuan San Hotel with unique designed. It is said that the hotel had trouble in sustaining the cost after the built of huge and long highways in front of the hotel. The highways bending over serves as a boomerang effect that caused unkind energies to the hotel.

This piece of rock is said to fence off the boomerang effect of the highways and since then the business of the hotel returned.

The entrance of the hotel and the main gate is called a 'bright hall', and having such huge and big bright hall is said to fence off the boomerang effect as well.
